REPLY BRIEF

Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks

Dear Sir:

This responds to new issues raised in the Answer.

"The name of the game is the claim". The examiner attempts to counter Appellant's point that Pennell's autofill form is not the one received from the server, but instead is the window 401 that is not received from the server, by observing that some of the data in the window 401 may have been initially supplied directly by the user or learned as the user entered data in the normal course of filling out forms on web pages. So what? Claim 1 requires allowing a user to select his or her name from the menu so that the autofill profile corresponding to the selected name is used to provide information to the electronic form from the server, which the window 401 is not. Even if the window 401 may be given data (1) supplied by the user (in an undefined way) or (2) "learned" from previous user inputs, it is not itself a form from the server as is otherwise required by Claim 1. Stated differently, that some of the information in the window 401 may be "learned" from previous user input to forms does not thereby transform the window 401 into the server form itself, which it is being used for in the rejection and which the examiner tacitly confesses is the case.

The examiner next attempts to explain away the fact that her own dictionary contradicts her equivalence of PINs with passwords by referring to the present specification. Incredibly, an SPE signed off on the use of the present specification in a rejection, presumably not understanding that the present specification does not form part of the prior art. An Applicant's own teachings cannot be used against it.

Respectfully submitted,
